There is a hill near, from which a fine view may be obtained of the valley along which caravans travel on their way to Khartoum. Next morning we left for Assouan, and paid a visit en route to the Valley of Lions, where we were given some grapes, the only ones we saw in Nubia. We also bought two chameleons, chiefly from motives of humanity, for the young merchant who offered them, a naked little wretch as black as jet, had tied their tails into a knot and was swinging them about in a manner that gave one vertigo to look at. We gave these two interesting reptiles the run of the cabin. They climbed up the curtains and explored the windows, and devoured the flies that there did congregate, and so long as they lived we were free from that fifth plague of Egypt....
