From Brougham Hall Campbell returned direct to London; but, after an absence of three months--the happiest three of his life --he confessed that it was no easy task to break off idle habits, and pull once more in harness. The friends and festivities of Scotland were still uppermost in his thoughts; and in a letter to Mrs. Ireland--the Mary Kenny of early days--he thus reverts to them: --Oct. 13th. . . The joy of my heart at meeting so many unchanged friends in Scotland has not yet subsided; and I need not say that, among the choicest of those friends, I reckon yourself and yours. How exquisitely went off your petits-soupers . . . I send you the enclosed letter, because I know it will please you, as containing honourable mention of one who is dear to you. You will better understand the letter when I explain to you that during my three days sojourn with Lord B. we quarrelled about the pronunciation of words! He said Lunnon, I said London! I told him he pronounced no better than John Moody in the Comedy. I reproached The passage is this: -- I wish you had been here when the Edinburgh deputation came tother day. I never saw better men; but they were strangers to me, and one of them, Mr. Ireland, is, it seems, a friend of yours. We were exceedingly pleased with him indeed. I was extremely vexed at...
